Sometimes theatre shows us slices of our own lives, and sometimes it shows us things a little less familiar. It's more of the latter in James McLure's double bill of Laundry and Bourbon and Lone Star. In McLure's 1970's Texas, the women are confined to housework and gossip (with a little alcohol thrown in), while the men cat about, brawlin' and drinkin' and generally misbehavin'. The three actresses that tell the women's story are all strong (Leslie Milne is a particular stand-out as the harried mother of some monstrous children), but their age disparity is a little disconcerting considering they are meant to have gone to school together. The men's story is both amusing and a little upsetting---the laughs come from their brutish/boyish behavior and the upset comes from one of the character's experiences during the Vietnam War. Both plays provide interesting snapshots of a different time and place. -Kate Watson
